Were your estimates too conservative, or too optimistic?

Generally speaking, I was able to complete my tasks in short order as the aim was to keep my workflow low due to my busy personal life going on at the beginning of the term (Due to moving primarily). I was able to complete most of my tasks in a timely fashion, but was held up on exporting and getting them into Unreal due to conflict with sizing confusion on the LDD as well as a lack of final reference images to move to an L1 state. We also had a decision to backlog extra fish and most of the lower priority models to put full focus on primary Characters.

What does this show off about your skills / what do you like about this asset?

I am actually very proud of how well I was able to translate the reference images I was provided into a simple L0 model. As someone who was terrified I would always suck at Characters, it's pretty heartening to get something brand new and be able to do it justice. With me also taking a bit of a lead towards the Podcast that helps the project on an advertising point, I was able to reinforce my direction and producing skills (Even though this part is going to be substantially put on the backburner going forward). Finally, with me shifting focus with the backlogging of most our non-essential models and me working on Narrative, I'm looking forward to my skills in expressive writing to help guide our team on where events will take place, what kind of dialogue will be exchanged, and how the game interacts with the player on a more first base level.

Try to dig a little bit into your own thought process if possible. What motivates you?

Positive reinforcement and passion. If I see other people showing interest and getting excited about the project, it helps to motivate me and just as much can leave me disgruntled if it's the other way around. This term has been a huge struggle for me with moving but also with this entire month of April as it's a very depressive time in my life every year due to PTSD and other factors for me and my family. I'm optimistic and motivated to get back on track now that we're well into May now.
